Forum concentrated on education topics Keeping 'Kings and Queens' From Becoming 'Bums'

BY RENÉE NOVY

An open forum, centering on improving education in the African-American community, with Shirley Tyree, member of the Omaha Board of Education, was sponsored Wednesday by the Minority Association of Pre-Health Students.

Tyree, who also serves as the center director of Girls Incorporated, answered questions posed by the audience round-table style.

One of the most pressing issues from the audience was the question of how the African-American community can support children in their attempts to better themselves in the classroom, and how to encourage students to actively seek out knowledge rather than to passively accept what is taught.

"I have tried to teach my children to be supportive of others in the classroom," Tyree said. "But we have to remember that our children have a wealth of knowledge simply through their upbringing before they even arrive in the classroom."

One of the biggest problems Tyree feels that many students face, especially in the secondary level, is the concept that asking questions and getting actively engaged in the learning process is considered uncool.

"I really think that people can be an example for each other. If you laugh at another student because he asks a question, other students are going to remember that," Tyree warned.

"Other students should not be able to answer for us what we feel is the right way to learn," she continued. "We should all be supportive of one another in the classroom."

Tyree believes that a possible solution for some of the following-along by students comes from an example the African-American people learned through slavery. "Some people survived [slavery] because they acted dumb. They did what was expected of them," Tyree noted. "This is the way we have to look at ourselves—and not let people put us into a box or a category. We can excel without that kind of thing."

"If you don't support each other, the world will chip away at you," Tyree told students.

The audience questioned among themselves with Tyree as to why African-American students express fear

Will you be my Valentine? what men and women want

BY SAVONDA NICOLE JOHNSON

Hopefully cupid's arrow will strike you this Valentine's Day, if it hasn't already. Or maybe today will be the day that most couples will look romantically in each other's eyes and realize their true affections for one another.

Several UNO students participated in a group discussion about love and romance Wednesday afternoon. They asked to remain anonymous, though, so their loved ones will not know what they are getting for Valentine's Day.

"My girlfriend and I will have been dating for a year today," a 24-year-old man said. "I will get her the traditional dozen red roses and chocolates because I know that is all she expects of me. She tells me she would be happy if I didn't get her anything."

On the other hand, some women really care about what they are getting for Valentine's Day.

"I told my boyfriend to make reservations at my favorite restaurant," said one freshman 18-year-old woman. "I expect to be picked up in a limousine and have a dozen white roses waiting for me when I come home."

Those who are not fortunate enough to spend the holidays with a loved one will be making plans to go out with friends.

"I don't have a boyfriend right now so I am going to go out with my friends and get wasted," said a 21-year-old woman.

The conversation turned to how they met their significant others, or what attracted them to the opposite sex.

"Looks, hair, body, and skin complexion are a definite must," said one female in the group.

"Clothes are very important," said one man. "You can tell a lot about a woman by the way she dresses and carries herself."

"I once bought my ex-boyfriend ties because he would buy an Armani tie that didn't match," said one girl in the group.

Then they discussed what the most important thing about a relationship is.

"Trust and honesty are key in having a good relationship," one of the men in the group said.

"Before anyone can have a successful relationship, they must have trust and honesty, but they must be able to communicate, too," a woman agreed.

Popularity of Spanish Class Speaks for Itself

BY ANA MERIZALDE

University of Nebraska Medical Center's Organizational Learning and Development department has put together a Spanish for Medical Personnel program to accommodate the increasing number of Spanish speaking patients at the Med Center.

"We work with many patients who only speak Spanish. So while we wait for a translator to arrive from the interpreters office, the doctors and nurses have found themselves trying to use the Spanish they do know to explain the medical procedures to these patients," said Marcia Shirk, a developmental specialist who is also coordinator of the new program.

SHIRK

The class has been underway since Oct. 14, 1996, and is offered at no charge to Med Center employees and students.

The program is tailored to the needs of the students enrolled. "We try to individualize the instruction," Shirk said.

"We advise students to write down 10 specific sentences and questions that concern them, because a pediatrician is not going to need the same Spanish medical terminology as a

Smooth Transitions Among Retention Program's Goals

BY AMY OTTERSON

Efforts to increase new enrollment and retain existing students continues at UNO. Dr. Vance Valerio, assistant vice chancellor of Student Development Services, is working with others around campus on a program called the First Year Experience, hoping to improve retention figures.

"We hope this program will help the student become more connected to an advisor, the campus, and other students," Valerio said.

An ongoing retention study began in 1992, when administrators evaluated methods to achieve a more positive campus environment. The campaign instills a strong positive image of the campus and its staff. This welcoming committee approach led to a second phase in 1993, emphasizing more in-depth advising techniques, including earlier placement testing and one-on-one advising sessions for incoming students.

Recruitment was the focus in 1994, centering on creating an inviting yet affordable environment for both traditional and non-traditional students. Relationship management between the prospective student and campus personnel is considered an imperative fixture if UNO is to continue to grow and retain students.

Valerio lists three primary tenants of the First Year Experience to create a nurturing environment: the development of the students as an individual self; as a learner; and linking the student to the University.

Beginning in early May, the student is encouraged to attend an orientation. This four-hour visit includes a tour of the campus, information on services available to the student, and concludes with the registration of the student.

Students must have already met with an advisor in order to register for the orientation. Through pre-orientation sessions, the student will be familiar with class requirements and availability. This is also the first of many attempts to help students to link themselves to UNO.

Of the 1,400 students who went through the orientation last year, 1,100 evaluated the program. Considering 22 points of interest, 90 percent of the students rated the advising and orientation experiences as superior.

This was only the beginning, Valerio said the First Year Experience lasts from that "very first encounter all the way to the final day of their first year." That time span creates many opportunities for the students to attach themselves from the University.

"The dilemma of retention may be attributed to a combination of things," Valerio said. The primary problem is the valuing of education is competing with other things. With UNO located in the heart of a prosperous city, many distractions exist, primarily the work/school conflict. Family and other financial responsibilities hold a close second.

"Omaha has a strong economy, and many students are working their way through school...taking much longer to graduate," Valerio said.

The constant internal struggles of a student may be a heavier weight on their academic decisions than campus activities. However, the Student Development Services and other agencies on campus are dedicated to creating a smooth transition to university life.

VANCE VALERIO

about speaking out in class in a manner that was more relaxed than a lecture, rather like an informal brainstorming session.

One woman offered the suggestion that in addition to manifestations of low self-esteem, African-American students might possibly suffer a type of post-traumatic stress disorder as a result of some of the things the community has been subjected to — poverty, lack of home attention, being bussed into other neighborhoods to school.

Tyree said educators are first in the line of contact for such students, because many of these children spend more time at school than in the presence of family members from day to day. "Many teachers and administrators have been the seed that can make these children believe that they really can become whatever they want to be if they just try," Tyree emphasized.

"Even at Girls Incorporated, we have children at 14 and 15 that have never been told they could be somebody. You might have to say it four, five, maybe 15 times, but you'd be surprised how much they can do once they believe in themselves."

She also reflected fears that she and some colleagues feel about upcoming changes for the Omaha Public School district. "In the next two or three years, we will be losing some of our best minority teachers and principals in the district because they'll be retiring. These were the people in the halls, that I know many of you I see here, might have received words of encouragement, hugs, pats on the back and strong words from when you needed them," Tyree said.

"Who's going to replace them when they're gone? Who will fill those spots if we are not now readying people for their spaces?"

Towards the end of the forum, Tyree encouraged students with families of their own as well as those without children to become active in the local school board and the local community.

"Like the old saying goes, it does take a village [to raise a child], and you here are all good role models to show our children what they can become," Tyree urged. "We have too many potential kings and queens for us to want to stand by and let them become bums," she said.

First Graders Understand the Signs, But UNO Students and Faculty Just Don't Get it

By STEPHEN CROUCHER

Whenever I come to school, I see it. Whenever I go to the gas station, I see it. Speeders and reckless drivers have become part of our society. They are everywhere. Take UNO for example. Every morning at 7:30 a.m., I turn off Pacific Street into Elmwood Park. When I make the turnoff, people start tailing my car. The speed limit sign says 15 mph. Yet, nobody wants to go 15.

Some irate UNO student pulls up behind my car and makes faces as if it's the end of the world. He will not make it to the stop sign five seconds before I will, what a shame. The students are not the only ones. UNO faculty can be just as bad.

Two weeks ago my father had to give me a ride home because my car was in the shop. When we turned the car into Elmwood Park, a faculty member started tailing our car. If our car would have made any sudden movements, the faculty member would have ended up in our windshield. I think she was trying to kiss the bumper. My father's thoughts about this rude faculty member were, "Working for the university and teaching students does not give them the right to set bad examples and be jerks just like those stupid, speeding kids."

This is a university, so why can't people read? Speed limit signs are not complicated. In fact, there are only two words and two numbers on the sign. A first grader can understand the signs. Yet, some university students and faculty members cannot read them. If the student body and the faculty cannot

Column 'Demonizing, One-Sided'

Dear Editor:

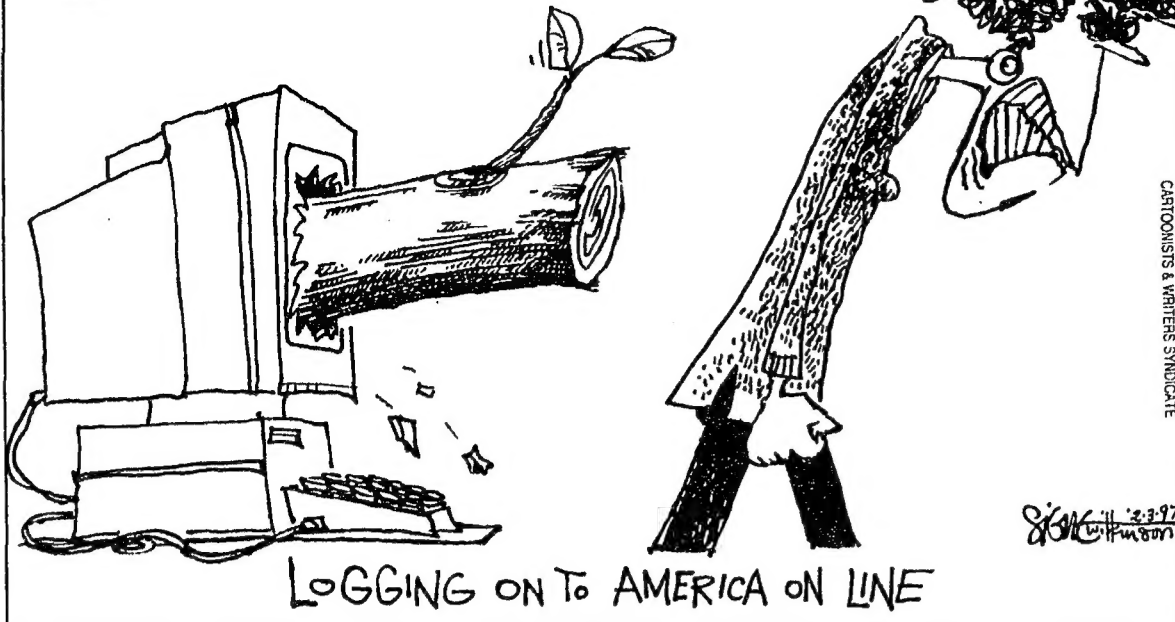

When whizzing through the Gateway I noticed a "Opinions and Editorials" by Brian Todd. I know in the past this guy enjoys writing one-sided issues dealing with African-Americans and Latinos. From reading a couple of editorials Brian Todd wrote in the past, I could tell he enjoys "demonizing" African-Americans and insult our intelligence.

Once again, I was not surprised to read another dry race baiting editorial by Brian the Gateway columnist. This particular column "Separation Exist in Economic Racial Inequality" wrote about African-American leaders who believe that the only way African-Americans can get a fair share in this country is by affirmative action and welfare is simply not true. The Nation of Islam and Louis Farrakhan basically believes the only way to achieve freedom, liberty and "true" justice is to leave the oppressors alone and separate from them completely. Too put in your own words personal responsibility and hard work. The NOI do not believe that black people should rely on the government. The rhetoric of Louis Farrakhan and the NOI preach is the same (besides the racial overtones and talk of separation) as the so-called black conservatives like a Rep. J.C. Watts of OK., Thomas Sowell and Ken "The Black Avenger" Hamblin? No reliance on the government for welfare or affirmative action is what both stand for right?

The problem emerges when black individuals like Rep. J. C. Watts and others of his ilk wrongfully blanket the entire African-American population in the USA as being "lazy, ignorant, mindless, criminal minded scum" or if not that "communist". The term "Uncle Tom" for individuals whom wrongfully place blame on entire population is too nice and incorrect. I think the term sell-out is properly fitting.

Don't Go Too Expensive, Too Cheap, or Forget Valentine's Day

Have you ever had trouble trying to find the "perfect" Valentine gift? This is something that has been tearing at my insides for the last few weeks. Now the day is upon me. Soon, loved ones will be scurrying up and down the lanes, overflowing with vigor and joy, feeling content and safe, knowing their significant other has remembered this special day. I, on the other hand, have decided to wait until the last minute. Procrastination is my specialty, usually leading me to work best under pressure.

Why do we celebrate Valentine's Day to begin with?

My theory is that men across the globe managed to pool all of their wonderful and brilliant thoughts to help ease the burden of relationships. They decided to designate one day to all the females they have meddled in the lives of, tortured, embarrassed, coerced, (need I go on?) etc. This one day will make up for the other 364 days of the year that men have, for lack of a better term, screwed up. It was a novel concept, and frankly, an outstanding idea. But how incredibly naive for the female population to fall prey to the hollow promises of such a shallow "holiday."

But it works. Somehow, some way, loved ones embrace the celebration of another year together.

It doesn't always work out this way, though. One of my friends, who will remain nameless (Summer) has designated this day of all days, "Black Friday." Does that make Valentine's Day insignificant to those who do not have another to love, to hold, or to cook dinner and wash your clothes?

The true Valentine is one where the company of two people, two souls, are together for the entire day, two people who realize that just being with each other is more than anything they could buy.

What a bunch of crap.

The day itself has become irreparably materialistic. No longer does your significant other look forward to receiving something, they expect it. And it doesn't matter what the gift is. It is never enough, or it is a "stereotypical" gift, i.e. flowers, candy, etc. This is not a personal reflection of my own Valentine experiences, but observations of other couples. I have become a victim of our society, and, to some extent, am materialistic. There aren't many people left who are non-materialistic.

Remember Valentine's Day in elementary school?

Mom would take you to the store so you could buy the coolest character Valentines on the shelf. The packages were so conveniently numbered that they required another purchase, unless of course, you cut the four that were printed on the back of the box. Much to the demise of mom's checkbook, it was uncool to cut the ones off the back, so you were left with about 20 some odd valentine cards. Then there was always that one person in class who you absolutely despised, but were required by both your parents and the teacher, to give a valentine to everyone in your class. Now you attempted to cut one off the back of the box, but mom quickly pointed out the high stack of unused cards. Little conversation hearts, combined with the taste of glue on those envelopes, made for a potent combination.

So what is the perfect Valentine's Day gift?

I don't think a standard gift can be set for everyone. It depends on who you're with, what they like and don't like. I found out last year that I'll never buy candy for Valentine's Day again. Try to surprise your loved one. Not something out of the ordinary, like skimpy lingerie, or chocolate body paint (unless you intend to use it). Remember, beauty is in the eye of the beholder. Don't get too expensive. Don't get too cheap. Most of all, just don't forget.

"This one day will make up for the other 364 days of the year that men have, for lack of a better term, screwed up."

Racism? Everybody Knows

By RENÉE NOVY

"Is racism still alive in the University of Nebraska system?"

Hmmm... I wonder, I think to myself sardonically as I try to somewhat gracefully answer the poor fool who asked me that question.

Racism undead holds us, tosses our universities around like a toy a child remembers periodically, tinkers with and soon forgets.

Last month, a skit performed by a fraternity using symbols that, in our country, hold highly racist connotations outraged not only the campus at University of Nebraska-Lincoln but Lincoln citizens as well.

This Monday, a highly visible reminder of racism came in the form of a cross inserted into the gas tank of the car of an (African-American) UNO employee as well as a racial epithet sprayed on a windshield.

Now it seems that a kind of stupor hangs over the campus after these two most recent events.

I have press releases concerning the matter from officials of the university littering my desk, I have a mirror in my purse that everyday reminds me while I powder my nose exactly who and what I am to others.

"Are you scared?" another asks me in class. Do you feel safe on this campus?"

Negativism aside, everybody knows this kind of thing happens all the time. Even so, any act by any person, whether that person is affiliated with the university or not is inexcusable any time for any reason.

As a child, my father tried to instill ideas in my consciousness that would have me follow in his own anti-white sentiment. A friend of his was torched outside a base somewhere near Biloxi, Miss., in the '60s, and this left him with a fear that in some degree still eats and tears at his soul.

I didn't know why then, but I knew not to listen to him, to doubt these feelings, these lessons. I sensed something that caused me to rebel against him, whether it was the golden lesson I learned in Bible school or a mind that was slowly being urged into independent thought.

That new mind is still in full function, still doubting, still growing.

I've had my own run-ins with neo-nazis in Germany and in the Old Market, in Omaha. I've had elaborate put-downs in both the school arena and the personal domain that focused on my color and my gender.

These incidents—especially this last, where a work-weary person leaves his (or her) shift and whatever problems that had to be resolved, only to have to face this kind of shit (again).

I can count on one hand the potentially violent situations I've run into with skinheads and the like, but if I had a nickel for every time a black person or Asian told me I wasn't enough of either side, I'd be at Oxford right now.

Now anyone, regardless of color, can attest to having experienced his own brush with racism. Any racist or gender-specific affronts are completely inexcusable. Even if that hanging, burning human in my father's 1960s had actually been my father, or your mother, personally taking that destructive instinct into one's own behavior is more of a burden than the vengeance could ever be worth.

We know these things and this latest incident is news happen, but it's nothing new.

Why isn't it? The basis of our country since before its inception has been inextricably tied with racism. We know the history, we see its revision, but nothing can change the truth.

But that doesn't mean we have to take this sitting down.

You see, the overwhelming outrage remains to be seen.

Will the university system act swiftly to condemn not just in words this action—or will silence follow the press releases?

Silence, rather than action has happened before in other cases of misconduct in this university system. The list of cases is innumerable and will get you in trouble if you bring up the memories.

What happened to that employee is an outrage with which anyone can identify.

Still, when something like this happens, especially when the University of Nebraska has ads in major magazines touting what we have to offer potential students, one can't help but wonder what will be done, and what others will think of our action or inaction.

Leonard Cohen was right. We all know what's going on. Trouble is, what are we going to do about it?

read, then the purpose of this university, educating, is defeated.

UNO is not the only place where people drive like "bats out of hell." Omaha is full of incompetent drivers. A simple trip to the mall or downtown can turn into an adventure. Everywhere you look, some woman is driving 85 mph on the interstate, putting make-up on at the same time, and smoking a cigarette. Some guy is even driving to work 25 miles over the speed limit because he only has ten minutes to go 30 miles. It's absurd.

Fortunately we can take steps to help slow down speeders and reckless drivers. First, if you cannot understand the speed limit signs, go back to first grade and watch "Sesame Street". In a state like Nebraska, where the taxes are so high, the general population should be literate. I do not think that is too much to ask. People who cannot understand the speed limit signs should not have a driver's license and should not be in a university.

Second, do not slow down for a speeder to pass you. If the speeder is in such a hurry to get somewhere, he should have left earlier. Not letting him pass may make the other driver upset. Foul language might start flying out of his mouth, but who cares. Our purpose as humans is not to let these drivers do whatever they want.

Third, please do not put on make-up while you are driving. Some can handle this without any problem, but most cannot drive and put make-up on at the same time.

Guys, quit trying to impress people, normally females, with how large and powerful your engines are. It looks very stupid when a guy tries to impress a girl by revving his engine. Anyway, if you have to rev your engine to impress a girl, you must be lacking in other areas.

Fourth, watch your speed. If you have to drive over the speed limit to get somewhere, leave earlier. Try not to put yourself in a situation where you have to hurry to get somewhere.

Fifth, do not tail others because they are not going fast enough for you. Tailing someone only makes you look arrogant. If more of us watch our speed and do not let others rule the road, the roads will become a safer place to drive. Just this morning I saw another moron trying to go 90 mph through Elmwood Park. My response was to slow down and keep the idiot behind me. If he cannot read the signs, well that's too bad. It's not my job to make his day a brighter one. I am following the law by obeying the speed limit. He should too.

Valentine's Day is Also National Condom Day

BY SAVONDA N. JOHNSON

Before things get too hot and heavy tonight don't forget that your first thought should be about how you and your partner plan to protect yourselves.

Although the only safe sex that exists is abstinence, for those of you who are going to participate in sexual activity, be sure that you use a latex condom. Latex condoms are 98 percent effective and could prevent one night of passion from turning into a lifetime of paying the consequences.

According to Planned Parenthood, the proper and most effective way to use your latex condom is as follows:

1. Use only latex condoms that are not stored in a glove compartment or wallet. Check the expiration date on the condom. Do not rip open the condom package with your teeth.
2. Put the condom on after the male partner has received an erection. Put a couple drops of a water-based lubricant inside the tip of the condom.
3. Squeeze the tip of the condom to leave some extra space and roll the rest down the penis shaft.
4. Put more water-based lubricant on the outside of the condom.
5. After use, dispose of the condom. Use a new condom every time you have sex.

Female Condoms

There is a new female condom, also called a vaginal pouch, on the market. The vaginal pouch is inserted into the vagina much like a diaphragm. The vaginal pouch covers the vulva, and can prevent a woman from receiving a sexually transmitted disease and unwanted pregnancies.

A benefit of the vaginal pouch is a man does not need to have an erection in order for the condom to be properly used.

New Condom

Avanti is the new polyurethane condom that is twice as thin and twice as strong as regular latex condoms. It is non-porous and non-permeable to all viruses including HIV. This Avanti condom is also heat conductive (which means it warms to body temperature). The polyurethane condom is also safe to use with oil based lubricants and is hypo-allergenic.

Pros and Cons of Condoms

Men and women have different likes and dislikes when it comes to condoms. According to Planned Parenthood, some couples put a condom on as part of foreplay, and many men have found that wearing a condom has caused them to have a longer erection.

Some men are self-conscious about using condoms because the feel that they must sustain a longer erection.

How to use a condom

Use latex condoms. Don't store condoms in a glove compartment or your wallet. Don't use them after the expiration date. Don't open them with your teeth.

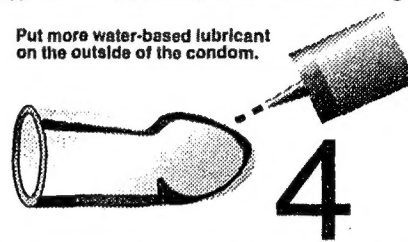

Put the condom on after you get hard. Put a few drops of water-based lubricant inside the tip of the condom.

Squeeze the tip of the condom to leave some extra space and roll the rest down the shaft.

If the penis is intact (has foreskin), put the condom on with the foreskin pushed back. Once the shaft is covered, push the foreskin forward (toward the tip). This lets the foreskin move without breaking the condom.

Put more water-based lubricant on the outside of the condom.

USE A NEW CONDOM EVERY TIME YOU HAVE SEX

Advice from an expert...

Couples Encouraged to Celebrate Their Differences this Valentine's Day

BY DR. JOHN F. DEMARTINI

Knight-Ridder/Tribune News

Couples have been celebrating their love on St. Valentine's Day since the 14th century. Bestowing gifts of flowers and candy, or sharing a romantic evening, has become a time-honored tradition. But what if you think your relationship is far from perfect, and hardly worth celebrating? Think again.

You may have the perfect mate, and not even know it. Many couples experience problems in their relationship because each person thinks their way of doing things is the right way. You want him to be more like you, and he wants you to be more like him.

If two people are the same, one of them isn't necessary in the relationship.

We all require both support and challenge to grow. A relationship is never finished, it is always being cultivated. As long as we're green, we grow; when we're ripe, we rot.

Continued growth in loving partnerships must be a priority. If partners become too much alike, they often end up separating, instead of enhancing their relationship with themselves and each other.

This Valentine's Day is an opportunity for couples to celebrate and honor their differences. It's a myth that two people should become more alike to maintain and nourish a healthy relationship. Seeing differences in each other gives us a chance to learn more about ourselves; because whatever we see in others, be it good or bad, is a reflection of something within ourselves.

The impetus to writing my book, "Count Your Blessings, The Healing Power of Gratitude and Love," came from the realization that the things we try to change in our loved ones, are the traits hidden within ourselves that we haven't learned to love. The primary purpose of marriage isn't so people can live happily ever after. (That is another myth.) Marriage and partnerships are designed so people can grow and discover. They find out what they don't love yet, and learn to love it both in their mate, and ultimately within themselves. That's one of the reasons opposites attract.

Think about some of the great marriages of our time: Gracie Allen and George Burns, Marge and Homer Simpson, Grace Kelly and Prince Ranier, Mary Matalin and James Carville, Fred and Wilma Flintstone, King Hussein and Queen Noor, Archie and Edith Bunker. These relationships are a tribute to respecting and appreciating what is different about our mate, and loving them for who they really are.

Everyone is worthy of love, no matter what they've done or haven't done. While leading hundreds of personal and professional development seminars, I have yet to meet a couple whose relationship doesn't have its own balance, and its own perfection. The more we count the blessings of our mate and our relationship, the more gratitude we have and the more our heart opens to the healing power of unconditional love. Unconditional love is loving and accepting someone exactly as they are, without having a desire to change them in any way.

If there is a personality trait in our mate that we resent and therefore try to destroy, we actually end up helping to create or strengthen it. Ironically, we reinforce their current behavior. But when we love someone as they are, we give them the freedom to change and maybe even alter the trait you dislike.

The other side of the coin is when you see a loved one as perfect. You are then in a temporary state of infatuation and illusion. Here is your choice: you can keep your eyes and hearts open and see all sides, positive and negative, of the person OR you can hang from your imaginary pedestal until it begins to disintegrate and come tumbling down around you. I think you'll agree the former is most preferable.

When we love someone exactly as they are, we give them the freedom to grow and change ... we give them our unconditional love. Love in its purest form. This is the greatest Valentine's gift anyone could offer or receive.

cardiologist. We teach medical terminology and vocabulary for parts of the body rather than teaching the entire Spanish language to our students," Shirk said.

This way, the doctors involved can ask pertinent questions and communicate with patients as much as is necessary to assist with treatment, which in turn, could widen the patient base for the doctor or clinic.

"So, having a background in Spanish can really be to the student's benefit," she smiled.

The class was so well received that more than double the students signed up to attend the second series of classes which were held in January.

"We have been getting extremely strong feedback from the students," Shirk said.

"The students have been very complementary of the two instructors. Osmin Reyes, a pharmacy technician at the Med Center and Jose Lopez, a part-time translator at the Med Center and a UNO student instruct the classes," she said.

Despite the success of the Spanish program, the Med Center has not yet considered starting other foreign language programs because the interpreter's office has filled the void with volunteer employee translators.

Because the program is so new, the Med Center has not yet gathered information about how much of an impact has been made by the doctors who have taken it upon themselves to learn Spanish, or how the patients feel about their bilingual hospital experience.

Still, Shirk feels that the medical community needs and wants this program.

Shirk is particularly impressed about how many different kinds of people are signing up for the course. "We have nurses, doctors, technicians and medical students all in line to take the course," Shirk said.

Even if people cannot manage to make it to the class, Shirk said several doctors have asked for vocabulary lists or workbooks they can study on their own.

Shirk has had little problems with publicity for the class.

"We have no problem getting the word out [about the class]. Sure, we do flyers and e-mail from time to time," Shirk continued, "but it seems that the popularity of the class speaks for itself."

Denise helps readers with Kleptomaniacs and 'Package Watchers'

BY DENISE GIAMELLE

Dear Denise,

I have a problem with a close friend of mine. She has a habit of "borrowing" things from me without my knowledge and not returning them, especially my music. In the past, when I've caught her red-handed, she's admitted it, but lately, when I've brought up the subject, she's completely denied everything. She'll sing songs around me that are stuck in her head from my missing tapes. I don't invite many people over to my house, and of those I do, no one really has the same taste in music as we do. To make matters worse, she and I also have in common really bad tempers. There are a lot of things about her I value, but this particular bad habit has me so steamed I could punch her in the eye. While I feel that our friendship is important, this kind of thing is trying my last nerve. What should I do?

Tweaked

Ask

has always stolen from you and lied to you, it is a different story. What kind of friend is that? If she lies about stealing from you, she is probably lying about other things, too.

If you decide to help her, I would suggest you talk to her calmly. You might want to find out who else she steals from (why should you be the only one) and help her return everything. But, habitual stealing is a bigger problem than that. She might need professional counseling. If she has just started stealing, she might be crying out for your help.

But let's look at the flip side of the coin. We often want to save the world. It is a big ego boost to think we can help someone who is in trouble. But, at what price?

After several years of trying to do what is right for everyone on earth, I had to stop and ask what is right for me and the most important people in my life. Hardest of all, I had to acknowledge that I cannot save every poor soul who happens my way. This realization removed a lot of emotional baggage I had been carrying. I now choose friends who can be real friends in healthy give-and-take relationships. It is a big improvement over me giving all the time and getting nothing in return. I deserve better, and so do you.

So, Tweaked, you have to make the decision here. But, please hold the bad temper. I would also ask myself why I would want to be with someone who brings out the worst in me (the urge to punch her). Good Luck.

Dear Denise,

Why is it OK for guys to look at girls' chests and ogle them publicly but if a woman looks at a guy's "package" she's a slut? I'm not saying I'm a "package-watcher," but I just think the difference is wrong. What do you think?

Not a "package-watcher"

Dear Tweaked,

I have to wonder how long you two have been friends. If it is a long time (years and years), she has helped you in heroic ways in the past, and this is a new behavior for her, then I would say she needs your help.

If, on the other hand, you have been friends for only a few years or months and she

Dear Not,

What do I think? You'll probably be sorry you asked but here goes. I think it is still a man's world and will be for a long time. Women are making progress but there is still a lot more to be done. I also miss being ogled because it is no longer politically correct.

But you bring up a game of the sexes that I can still enjoy. You are right, women cannot openly appreciate how a man looks. Subtlety is the key. In male dominated societies, women have been able to weave their own little spells and establish their power bases. It just takes a light touch. This is where the fun comes in.

In your example, instead of yelling, "Hey look at the size of...(you get the idea), like a man would do, just look at him. If you are interested, let him notice you are looking at him and then quickly look away. Since men are a little slow, you will have to do it a few times so he will know for sure what is going on. It will drive him crazy.

Of course, you have to pretend all the while that you are not the type of girl who would notice such things about a man. Eventually, he will have to come to you to find out if he is guessing right.

These games are a lost art. Television and the need for immediate gratification have speeded things up in our lives. But, Not, if you can master these old tricks, you will get the message across and seem like a "lady" at the same time. And you will start attracting the type of man who appreciates what women can add to the world.

Dear Readers,

For new readers and those with short attention spans, it is time to remind you that I am not a professional. I am merely a disinterested third party. Sometimes we need someone to point out the obvious. Other times we need to hear what we already know but do not want to face. If you have a question I can ask at an office on campus that you do not want to ask in person, I can do that, too. I would also like to hear from you, especially if you think my answers are wrong. Have a problem or burning question? Send your letter to Dear Denise at the Gateway. Sorry, I can only answer letters in the paper and I get to pick which questions. Unlike letters to the editor, I do not need your real name and address, just your question. Letters can be sent to editor@gateway.unomaha.edu mailed to the Gateway (MBSC115, Omaha Ne. 68182) or dropped off in room 115 in the Student Center. Call 554-2420 if you have questions.

People such as Rep. Watts of OK, Ken "The Black Avenger" Hamblin are the same type of coloured people that tried to undermine people like Martin Luther King Jr., W. E. B. DuBois and a whole host of others. There is nothing new under sun Todd.

As for slavery and the Sudan, Brian Todd is severely misinformed about the issue or issues. First of all, yes there is slavery that is going on in Sudan, but it is not only a case of black Africans enslaving other black Africans. The Arabs, some Muslims, some black Africans, and Berbers populations in Sudan and North Africa is enslaving black Africans at this present moment. But, the problem with Brian Todd argument is to compare the type of slavery in the Western Hemisphere as the same as slavery in ancient Africa. The type of slavery in Africa allowed a slave to keep his or her identity, religion, culture, language and family ties. The slaves in Africa was allowed to marry into the families of the owner, allowed to have rights as any other individual and allowed to become chief of the village whom he was enslaved by. This sounds familiar with the history of the Ireland and the British or endenture (sp?) slavery in America and Europe. Think before you speak or write Brian.

As for this crap about "race-hustling poverty pimps" comment by you (which you copied from J. C. Watts) is false. As for Jesse Jackson being a race-hustler, only one thing I have to say to your belligerent. Do you remember the Texaco executives saying that is why the "black jelly beans" stay at the bottom because no one wants them or using the word nigger as a everyday vocabulary word. This affected the economic mobility of the African-American working for that corporation. But listening and reading the ideology of people like Todd leaves one believing that African-Americans must be dreaming about racism. Trying to make Jesse Jackson sound like he chasing a chocolate cow is foolish for Brian and the dubious so-called black conservatives to it bring up.

Personally, I don't like Jesse Jackson nor Louis Farrakhan or I don't like Rep. J. C. Watts, Thomas Sowell, and Ken Hamblin but some of the things they both say is the truth. Trying to silent the rhetoric of who ever is wrong, and they have the right to have their opinions and beliefs in America. I hear both liberals and conservatives call each other socialist but truthfully both of party can be and at times are socialist. While both parties is talking out of both sides of their mouths. Racial division in this country will get worse due to the blind and ignorant race baiting maggots such as Brian Todd and others keep acting as if nothing exist and nothing is wrong. Having the attitude and nefarious bias such as yours and others will someday cause the destruction of this great country what we know as the UNITED STATES OF AMERICA. Brian Todd and the Gateway newspaper is a joke and I wasted my time by bothering to write.

Robert Green will be starting for the Mavs Saturday night in Greeley, Colo. as the Mavs face the Northern Colorado Bears. After demolishing the Bears with a home court advantage earlier this season, the Mavs will be looking to do the same Saturday night.

Preparation Key for Wrestlers

BY JEFFREY CASADY

After returning home from back-to-back wins Saturday against St. Cloud State and Southwest Minnesota, the No. 1 ranked UNO wrestling team has spent the week preparing for tonight's showdown with third ranked Central Oklahoma in the UNO Fieldhouse.

The dual is a rematch of the National Dual Tournament final where UNO posted a 21-16 victory, breaking Central Oklahoma's 53-match home winning streak.

A rivalry between these teams ignited after the Mavericks overcame Central Oklahoma for the national championship in 1991. Since then, the two teams are even in head-to-head competition.

"This is what it's all about," said Mav Head Coach Mike Denney. "We're fortunate to wrestle the No. 3 team in our own house." Denney said with the presence of the media, television coverage, and large home-crowd support, the Mavs are capable of exploding against Central Oklahoma.

Denney said the Mavs prepared for tonight's dual as they would for any other competition. "I'm approaching this the same as any other match," said all-American Chris Blair (150 pounds). "I have been working out three to four times a day and tonight is going to be awesome. We're prepared to show why UNO has the No. 1 team, coach, and support staff in the nation."

Boyce Voorhees (142 pounds) believes the team must stay relaxed and feel confident, while not allowing any pressure to encumber their preparation. "In the National Duals I felt a little tense, which kept me from opening up my offense. You have to look past all the pageantry and approach it as you would any other match," said Voorhees.

This is the Mavs' final home dual. Central Oklahoma should serve as solid competition and help the Mavs prepare for the North Central Conference Tournament March 2.

The dual between the two nationally ranked Division II teams begins at 8 p.m. in the Fieldhouse.

Basketball Teams Looking to Stuff N. Colorado Bears

BY JONATHAN PELPHREY

The UNO basketball teams will face the Northern Colorado Bears this weekend in Greeley, Colo.

The road trip will be an important test of determination, as both the Mavericks and the Lady Mavs approach the end of the season with five games remaining on the schedule.

Mavs Prepare For Final Stretch

The Mavericks are playing a Northern Colorado team that has been at or near the bottom of the North Central Conference standings all season. The first time they met, the Mavs defeated the Bears 85-68.

Head Basketball Coach Kevin Lehman said his Mavs would not be looking past the 7-14 Bears this weekend, however.

"In the NCC, anybody can win at any time," he said. "We have to be ready to play every time we get out on the court."

Lehman said it was important for his team to play particularly well on the road. The Mavericks' next three games are all on the road. They don't return to the UNO Fieldhouse until Feb. 28 when they host South Dakota.

The Mavericks hold a 5-8 NCC record going into the game with Northern Colorado, and will be looking to finish the season in a better position than their current seventh place. Lehman said he believes his team may still have a shot at a berth in the post-season tournament. Northern Colorado is 3-10 in conference play and in last place.

Probable starters for the Mavs are Danny McLarty, guard; Shadric Thomas, guard; Troy Kloewer, forward; Robert Green, forward; and Charles Thompson, center.

Lady Mavs Determined

The women's basketball team has had an on again/off again season. The Lady Mavs went 12-1 through Jan. 10 but since then, have only won two of their last eight games.

The Lady Mavs' loss to Northern Colorado on Jan. 18 in the Fieldhouse may have been a turning point. It was the first home loss for the Lady Mavs. "We thought we should have had them at home," Lady Mav Head Coach Cherri Mankenberg said. "We thought they gained a lot of confidence after they beat us here at home. Because they were struggling."

The 16-5 Bears are not struggling very much now, according to Mankenberg.

"They're playing very strong and they're shooting the ball very well," she said. "They've got all five seniors. They're a veteran squad and they're tough."

The Lady Mavs will look for another turning point

No. 3 in latest polls Lady Mav Runners Nationally Ranked

By JONATHAN PELPHREY

The UNO women's track team has earned the No. 3 spot in the latest Division II Indoor Track and Field Dual Meet Rankings released Wednesday.

The Lady Mavs, who trail only Abilene Christian University and Northwest Missouri State University, are ranked far ahead of their nearest North Central Conference competitor, No. 22-ranked Mankato State.

Lady Mav Head Coach Tim Hendricks said the ranking was not necessarily an indicator of how well the Lady Mavs will do at the conference championships Feb. 23 and 24. He said the ranking system favors balanced teams over teams with a few outstanding athletes. But he said he was surprised to see teams like North Dakota State, a perennial powerhouse in the NCC, missing entirely from the list.

The balance in UNO's team shows up in the Division II individual rankings, released Monday, which are based purely on individual marks. No UNO athlete is ranked higher than No. 3 in their event, but the Lady Mavs do have a solid representation as a team.

Carri Butler has the third-best time in the 400-meter dash this year, and holds the No. 10 spot in the 55-meter dash, just three one-hundredths of a second ahead of UNO's Tunisia Ellis, ranked No. 12.

In the Mile Run, Tara Biltoft owns the No. 4 spot, with Elise Henry, at No. 6, close behind. Jaime Erkes is No. 15 in the 55-meter hurdles, and Sandy Derby is No. 10 in the High Jump.

The 4x400 relay team has the third-best time in the country.

Theresa Williams has earned the No. 4 spot in the Shot Put, and is ranked No. 16 in the weight throw.

The Lady Mavs have one more meet before the North Central Conference Indoor Championships. The Fast Chance Meet will be held this Saturday beginning at 9 a.m. in the DakotaDome at the University of South Dakota.

The team was originally scheduled to compete in the NIAC meet this Friday, but Hendricks said the team switched in order to get a better feel for the DakotaDome, which will be the site of the conference championships. The Fast Chance Meet will also give the team an opportunity to square-off against NCC competition.

-- from Bball,

in this weekend's rematch with the Bears.

"A great thing would be to go out there and beat them," Mankenberg said. "There's not anybody we can't beat when we play together as a team. But we've got to believe it. We've got five games left, so we've got to finish this in style."

Probable starters for the Lady Mavs are Jacinda VanFossen, center; Amy Breen, forward; Stacie Kaiser, forward; Jill Ohm, guard; and Katie Welsh, guard.

Senior guard Amy Loth should see some more playing time this weekend, after playing briefly last week. She is recovering from a broken bone in her foot.

Jill Ohm (#32) battles for the ball for the Lady Mavs. The Lady Mavs will face the Northern Colorado Bears Saturday night in Greeley, Colo.
